Compound colour adjectives

These rules seem overly prescriptive. We do sometimes use the two colour names to indicate an intermediate colour. So "A blue-green shirt" is a turquoise. The expression "She has only blue and green shoes" is ambiguous. It could mean that she has some blue and some green shoes, or it could mean all her shoes are patterned blue and green. Using hyphens can reduce that ambiguity in written English. But if a completely unambiguous sentence is required, then you would have to rephrase. The example with flowers is similarly ambiguous. If it matters, then the expression could be rephrased. The hyphenated form is ugly and difficult to say, so wouldn't be used in practice. Normally it doesn't matter much if the flowers are individually red, yellow and pink, or pattern with red, yellow and pink, so the ambiguity can be allowed to remain. I've read this in my grammar book "compound adjectives of colour! e.g. bleu ciel, vert clair, bleu foncé, rouge vif, bleu-vert. Two or more words, more generally, because in some cases there may be no adjectives or basic color terms involved at all: feuille-morte, poivre et sel, lie-de-vin, etc. Compound adjectives of color are the ones made of two adjectives... Isn't it just two (or more) words? "Ciel" isn't an adjective, for instance. We have compound adjectives in English, too, Music - and they can have multiple adjectives or adjectives and other words: sky blue, dark blue, ramrod-straight, white-hot... EDIT: What the Captain said. Yes, definitely words not necessarily adjectives. Sorry! (Sometimes there is even no adjective at all, e.g., lie-de-vin.) P.S. In English you have compound adjectives as well but you don't care since adjectives are invariable in English anyway.
